Jeremy Wade uses a politically charged form of queer science fiction to see through the complicated now. In his latest show Lost at Sea with Puddles and Sunny he (together with the music of Quentin Tolimieri) portrays a broken scrappy bird of a cabaret singer named Puddles the Pelican who lives on a Cruise Ship at the end of time. As a survivor of the Deep Horizon Oil Spill, Puddles sings squawks, moans and tells stories of love and loss to keep the cruise ship passengers awake. Choking on bits of tar and flailing all fantastic she quacks, "Once a glorious bird, now covered in oli, which one of you Bitches has a match?" She squawks, cries, moans and sings her heart out night after night in reverence of all that is lost. She finds the light in the darkest hour with her deeply tragic sense of humor and fights for impossible repair with every last breath.

So many times, artist try to crossover art practices to challenge themselves or because they want to express themselves in a different light. This is tricky and although I encourage this, sometimes it just doesn't work. Not the case with Jeremy Wade's Puddles incarnation. Through his body awareness practice Jeremy has managed to create an engaging and disturbing desperate singing night club act that fills you with emotions, lifts you with humor and then tears you down in a matter of seconds. His vocal fragility and delivery is masterful. Book him. - Peaches
